Access to prosperity for all.

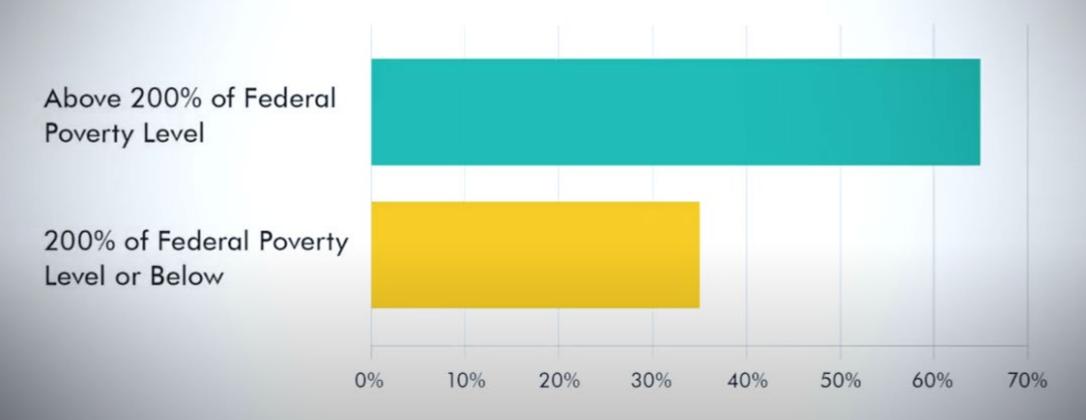

THE PROMISES OF SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS: LESSONS FROM RANDOMIZED EVALUATIONS

This publication presents a comprehensive overview of the experimental evidence on summer youth employment programs in the United States, drawing on thirteen papers examining programs across four major U.S. cities.

By Yiping Li and Kalila Jackson-Spieker (J-PAL North America, MIT)

j-p.al/SYEP

Employment Rate for Individuals Aged 16–19 by Household Income

Spievack, Natalie and Nathan Sick. "The Youth Workforce: A Detailed Picture." Urban Institute, July 2019. ç p. 3

Randomized evaluations have examined the impact of SYEPs on:

Employment and Earnings

Criminal Justice System Involvement & Youth Safety

Education and Youth Development

Summer youth employment programs can reduce rates of

Arrest

Arraignment

Conviction

Incarceration

Effects can last at least a year past the program summer

Evidence is emerging that summer youth employment programs can improve:

Career aspirations

Academic aspirations

School attendance

On-time high school graduation

Policy recommendations

Localities interested in reducing young people's contact with the criminal justice system should consider additional investments in SYEPs.

The research examined in our SYEP evidence review shows that SYEPs consistently reduce arrests, arraignments, convictions, and incarcerations for the populations they serve. Youth involved in the juvenile and criminal justice systems tend to face increased barriers to completing high school and are more likely to be incarcerated as adults. Few programs have been so successful in reducing not only initial contact with the criminal justice system at the point of arrest, but also additional points throughout the pipeline of involvement with the court system. By successfully leveraging connections with local community organizations and businesses, SYEPs help youth and young adults access positive experiences that can help them succeed and stay safe both during and beyond the program summer.
